Research Interests:

I don't think of myself as a scholar who works in a particular literary or historical field, but rather as someone who is drawn to problems. After my early training in Philosophy (with an informal side-line in film) I entered English studies as a student of Philip Sidney, Petrarch, and the Renaissance sonnet sequence. However, I learned very rapidly that the answers to my questions were to be found in the material objects—early printed books and manuscripts—in which they were circulated. I encountered the book as a material object again in my earliest teaching, which was on Canadian literature. So of course I set out to edit from the original manuscripts the complete poems of the contemporary poet James Reaney (published in 1972).

Soon I began to work on early Canadian writing (chiefly exploration literature) where there was a real need for someone who understood manuscripts and early books. This has led to synthesising work—articles, a major conference, an anthology—on the sources and literary role of exploration writing in Canada. In recent years my interest in exploration writing has led me to publish several widely-read articles on indigenous inscription in North America. Concurrently I have kept up my research on Sidney, emphasising his family, their library and the 5000+ titles in its catalogue. I also continue to work on Petrarch, deeply researching a critical but affectionate article on his twentieth-century editor Ernest Hatch Wilkins—who amazingly never travelled to see the manuscripts—along with an entertaining but challenging piece for students on the literary design of Petrarch’s Canzoniere. I’ve done a good deal of editing, including a title in the multi-volume edition of Northrop Frye’s critical writings 1933-63. Though I am not a follower of Frye’s critical system, he was a friend, and I find him an immense stimulus to thought, especially on my later work.

I keep in touch with scholars internationally who work on manuscripts, books, and book history, and review new books regularly as a form of continuing education in the areas I’m interested in. For the past decade I’ve been writing, and occasionally publishing pieces from, a major study (in progress) of the Western European codex, the folded and bound book we are all accustomed to: on the metaphors it has engendered, its historic hegemony, and the methods we have used, innocently or critically, to understand it, all in the setting of the present anxieties about its future in the light of the digital turn.

Essay included in American Contact, edited by Glenda Goodman (University of Pennsylvania) and Rhae Lynn Barnes (Princeton). Volume proposed for publication to University of Pennsylvania Press. (volume acceptance and publication date forthcoming).

K) Work in Preparation:

That Book in Your Hands: A Critical History of the Codex. This long-term project, now well-advanced, is a study of the western European codex, the metaphors it has engendered, its historic hegemony, and the methods we have used, innocently or critically, to understand it, all in the setting of the present anxieties about its future in the light of the digital turn.

The Last of the Old North-Westerners: the Autobiographical Notes of John McDonald of Garth, edited by Carolyn Podruchny and Germaine Warkentin. The Champlain Society, Toronto. Proposal accepted and contracts signed, October 2018. Estimated completion date 2024.

The Library of Prince Rupert of the Rhine (BL Sloane 555). (ed. Joseph L. Black and Germaine Warkentin, with contributions by Susie West). Planning in progress.

“Memory and Authority: Revisiting Samuel Hearne at Bloody Fall.” A new study of the manuscript and printed versions of Hearne’s famous account of the massacre of Inuit by Dene at Bloody Fall, NWT, in 1771. Originally given as lectures in 1995 and 1998; I continue to work on these much-discussed materials.
